

Banqueting House Whitehall, London, SW1A 2ER

Originally the property of the Archbishops of York, the Banqueting House was used to provide entertainment for Charles I, and was later the scene of his execution.

After the fire that destroyed Whitehall Palace in 1698, it was used as a chapel until 1890. From 1896 until 1962 the Banqueting House was occupied by the Royal United Services Institute and used as a museum.

In use as a chapel, the Banqueting House was extensively repaired and renovated, and became known as a concert hall in the 19th century before being given to the nation as a museum by Queen Victoria in 1893.

When completed the Banqueting House astounded London society, and it still has the power to dazzle and impress. The dramatic Banqueting House offers two spacious, versatile venues for entertaining, networking, conferencing or celebrating.

Its magnificent ceiling and grand scale makes the Main Hall an unforgettable location for any high-profile or important event. The Undercroft, once used by James I, today can be used as an atmospheric reception area or as an intimate venue. Its central location on Whitehall makes it one of the London's most sought-after event venues.
